Consequently the facts of his life are simple, honest, and open. Born in the south of France, almost on the Spanish border, he grew to early manhood among a bright, gay, laughter-loving people whose greatest pleasure was in their homes. He was rather quiet as a boy, and all the villagers remarked that, since he cared so much for school, he would probably some day become the village schoolmaster. This worried him because, while he enjoyed his studies, he did not think he wanted to teach. Neither did he think he could be a cooper like his father and make strong, fine barrels that sold well in the market. He was sorry, for he would have liked to be as great a business man as his father. Such were the dreams of the little boy as he went back and...
